Health Aspects of Pigeon Droppings.

Most of us, from our childhood years, learn to appreciate wildlife and birds. But the fact remains that this species of bird known as the feral pigeon or "wild" pigeon has a strong potential for disease. And pigeons are legally classified as a "pest animal" due to the concern for public health problems.

There are numerous hazards associated with pigeons and their roosting sites on or within a building. Among the diseases it can transmit and carry are encephalitis, toxoplasmosis, salmonella poisoning and Histoplasmosis. Histoplasma Capsulatum is an organism transmitted in pigeon droppings through spores. This causes a fungal infection known as Histoplasma. In fact areas with large accumulations of dried pigeon droppings can pose a potential health hazard.

Clean-up and removal must be handled with proper health and safety procedures.

Damages to buildings can be enormous due to the highly acidic droppings of pigeons.

Air conditioning units, air ducts, rooftops, walkways and balconies are all affected by their nesting sites. Their nesting sites can harbor many Parasites such as; lice, fleas, mites, ticks, bed bugs and carpet beetles. When a family of pigeons finds a nesting site they will begin to breed and populate very quickly.

As we become more knowledgeable with regard to the feral pigeon you can see why this problem must be addressed. Our intention is not to eliminate the pigeon but to control their numbers and nesting areas.
